

the importance of the new generations

BY JOAN PIÑOL

Currently many children in the Middle East are living without parents and without the education that would be necessary in their age. Most of them are not really aware of what is happening in their country and sometimes they play with weapons or dangerous objects, sometimes already useless.

The photo that I have chosen was taken on June 22, 2015 in the South of Kubani, Syria. The photographer was Sedat Suna and this photo became very famous around the world. In this photo there are four Syrian children playing in an apparently non functioning tank as if it were a children's park when really at the time that was a killing machine. These children need someone to tell them that they shouldn't play with it because despite being inactive, there can happen anything like exploding for any reason. I can deduce that these children do not have parents either because they have died, abandoned them or separated for any reason and are in different parts without knowing each other.

The authorities should send more groups of people to educate children well. Sure that there are many people willing to educate children who need it.
